Tusla gets extra €1m to inspect childminding services

Evelyn Ring

The Child and Family Agency, Tusla, is to be given an extra €1m in funding next year to support its work in inspecting childminding services.

Childminding services will be under added pressure next year, when 48,000 extra children enter the system as part of the affordable childcare scheme, announced in Tuesday's budget.

Some 23,000 additional children will enter the childcare system under the targeted supports, with a further 25,000 joining when universal support is introduced next September.

Children's Minister Katherine Zappone is confident the additional capacity exists. "So, we expect that there is room for the capacity to grow within the system, but there will be challenges and we are preparing for those in different ways," she said yesterday.

The minister said she was very aware of the concern the scheme would significantly increase the requirement for Garda vetting of childcare staff, and said she had been working with the Garda Vetting Bureau in the last few months to reduce the time taken to vet employees.

Fewer than 1% (150) of all childminders are registered with Tusla, and the minister's department will be encouraging more childminders to register.

The regulations state to register with Tusla, someone has to be minding more than three unrelated children outside the children's home.

Childminding Ireland, the national body for childminders, has been asked to see how more childminders could register and avail of the scheme.

Ms Zappone and her department are forming a working group to establish the supports and reforms needed for the sector.

Resource teacher plans welcomed

Niall Murray

Plans for a new way to allocate resource teachers from next autumn are welcome, but must be matched by a reversal of previous cuts, say parents of children with special needs.

Under a pilot scheme being run this year, some schools are allocated additional teaching time based on a range of factors other than simply their pupils' categorised disability or educational need.

Education Minister Richard Bruton announced in his 2017 budget that he plans to extend the system to all schools, aided by 580 extra resource teachers at primary and 320 at second-level.

It is intended to replace the system under which some students wait longer to get support as their families or schools can not afford or access the required professional assessments.

However, the resources have been proportionately reduced since 2011, when the weekly hours of resource teaching assigned each child was reduced by 10%, followed by a further 5% cut since 2012.

While resource teacher numbers have risen each year to reflect more children needing help in mainstream schools, those pupils continue to receive 85% of what they would have had before 2011.

The new model will give schools greater flexibility to distribute how their overall resource teaching allocation is shared, but they will still be operating from a smaller share per pupil than in the past.

Lorraine Dempsey, the chairwoman of the Special Needs Parents Association, said that lost teaching time has still yet to be recouped.

"We're glad that it's planned to roll out a new model from next year, meaning the allocation of extra teaching is based on educational need and not simply on category of disability."

"But we're still looking to have the 15% addressed in terms of overall, we still have a dilution of 15% there from 2012," she said.

Ms Dempsey said parents will also want assurances that there are adequate psychological and other supports in place to support schools under the revised system.

Mr Bruton said on Tuesday that the new system would free up members of the National Educational Psychological Service from having to carry out the assessments currently needed to allocate resource teachers.

He estimated that one-third of the 580 extra primary-level resource teachers will be over and above what would otherwise be allocated next year just to cater for extra numbers of pupils with special educational needs in line with overall school enrolment rises.

Meanwhile, Mr Bruton should learn today if he faces industrial action and possible school closures by the Association of Secondary Teachers Ireland over equal pay for younger teachers, and the possible withdrawal from supervision and substitution duties at more than 400 second-level schools.
